Foremost among these is the episode of the fish. It may be perfectly true that there are fish in the Mediterranean large enough to swallow a man whole<sup>1</sup>, and that a man has actually been known to have been rescued alive after having been swallowed by a certain kind of whale. But that a man should remain two or three days in the belly of a fish and then be vomited forth safe and sound on to the dry land goes far beyond the bounds of human experience. Of course with God all things are possible, and we may not say that this could not have happened. But a suspicion naturally arises that we have here a story rather than an actual event. The same may be said about the narrative of the repentance of Nineveh. It is possible for those who hold to the literal truth of the book, to suppose that the fame of Jonah's adventure had preceded him to Nineveh, and that his name was in every one's mouth before he arrived with his message of doom. With regard, too, to the actual repentance of the city, attention has been drawn by Dr Kennedy<sup>2</sup> to a fragmentary inscription in which the king of Nineveh enjoined a fast of an hundred days when the city was sore beset by the Medes and Babylonians. But the cases are not quite parallel and there is, to say the...
