This report is made in connection with certain bacteriologic studies in which they tried to show that the disease is an infection by the influenza bacillus with a secondary infection by some other organism. It will not be necessary to go into this part of their paper, but a brief outline of their description of cases may prove instructive. They believe that what they call the straightforward influenza cases are similar to those of ordinary influenza as it occurs at other places and at other times. They noted a great frequency of epistaxis, that vomiting occurred in some and diarrhea to a less extent, and that abdominal pain was not a very marked feature. The temperature remained raised a variable length of days. The pneumonic cases may start off as such, or there may be symptoms of a milder type for several days before the onset of the pulmonary symptoms. The patient complains in some way of his chest, coughs with a dry hacking, often complains of pain on one or other side and occasionally has a scarlatiniform rash of transient duration, and in some there is a profuse clammy sweat, often leading to widespread sudamina. The breathing becomes rapid and varied from thirty to sixty times per minute, but there is no dyspnea in the sense of distress. The face is first flushed and red, but it speedily becomes less red and more of a lavender or violet hue, or, as the authors suggest,...
